TEACHING ENGLISH AS A FOREIGN LANGUAGE

Annotation: This article is about teaching English as a foreign language to students and how it can be taught in a foreign language. It also provides information on the challenges of learning English as a Foreign language.

Key words: English, world language, multilingual, bilingual, speak as a native speakers.

It is no secret, we learn English as a foreign language nowadays, this language is very popular and even in school it is taught to children. However, it should be noted that we hardly use it our daily lives. For example, Spain, Russia and Brazil do not need this language in national or social life and rarely use it. But a large part of the population of this countries hard-working to learn this language and has set itself a reason or goal to learn it. By learning this world language, it is not uncommon for them to visit America or Britain to study, work, travel, take their language skills to the next level, or speak like native speakers. If people are fluent in English and their mother tongue, they are bilingual. But if they learn not only these languages but also other languages in depth, they will become multilingual people. Nowadays, some people, being of different nationalities, get married on condition that their children learn two languages perfectly throughout their lives and do not face and difficulties. Of course, people who speak many languages are treated differently among people. It is especially surprising that non-native speakers can speak English fluently and apply it to their lives. Clearly, it is a natural for learners to have difficulty in learning English as a foreign language and to have difficultly choosing American or British English and at the same time to confuse American and British accents in some cases. However, the use of English language directions also depends on the geographical, location and political situation of the countries. Foreign students of English in Mexico and Philippines tend to learn American English, but Europeans tend to learn British English.

In Japanese politics, however, these two language trends are being taken equally. This data shows that in developed countries, English is considered a second language and its study is strictly controlled. English is used not only to express their feelings, but also to be aware of official information. Because a lot of information and radio broadcast are first translated into English and then into other languages and made available to public. Therefore, in many countries, English is taught as a foreign language
